8 Forming Artistic Identity

Contemporary western society has been largely dominated by men, and by a focus on science and technology. In that social climate, artistic women have had challenges in developing themselves and their creative vision. As part of the quest for her own artistic identity, Victoria Christensen studied the growth processes of twenty-five women artists in southern Oregon and northern Arizona. Here, she sheds light on what it takes for a modern women to successfully create her individual artistic identity.

Photographer Dana Palmer captures her own identity in a self-portrait.

Elections and Air Time

Senator John McCain (R-AZ) recently attracted media attention by announcing his intention to introduce legislation which would afford free broadcast air time to political candidates. Cosponsored by Senators Feingold (D-WI), Torricelli (D-NJ) and Congressman Meehan (D-MA), the bill contemplates reforming American electoral politics in two ways.

First, the legislation proposes instituting a spectrum tax on all radio and television stations amounting to one percent of each station's gross annual revenues. Additionally, during the six weeks preceding an election, the bill would require radio and television stations to devote at least two hours of air time a week to candidate and issue-centered programming such as debates, candidate interviews or town hall meetings.

The purpose of the spectrum tax on broadcast licensees would be to aggregate a pool of money which would be given to qualified candidates, to use in purchasing air time. Explaining his support of the proposed legislation, Rep. Marty Meehan said: "The costs of modern campaigns have skyrocketed because of the ever-increasing costs of broadcast advertising. The prime beneficiaries of these advertising revenues are broadcast license holders, who enjoy the free use of our public spectrum."

The idea behind the first portion of the proposal, a tax on station revenues and the system of vouchers from those funds which candidates would use to purchase air time, is salutary. The electoral process was never conceived as a profit-making business, which is largely what it has become. The proposed mechanisms, including the tax and voucher system, may not be the best method of achieving the desired objective even if the goal is worthwhile.

The second proposal, however—the requirement that stations devote program-length air time to covering candidates and issues—immediately caught my eye. Hear, hear!

From the dawn of radio broadcasting the electronic media have been heralded as the single greatest advance in support of democracy. Political scientists, politicians, educators and citizens all welcomed the prospect of serious debate about issues and candidates and the opportunity for all citizens to make informed electoral decisions in the face of that wealth of information. What has evolved instead is a system of marketing candidates and issues much like any other commodity or service. In advertising there is an old adage: "Sell the sizzle, not the steak," meaning that causing the public to become attracted to the idea of the steak's taste, rather than to the steak itself, is the key to making an advertiser successful.

Hordes of political media consultants have continued to buy into those marketing concepts, so that successful political campaigns now revolve far more around image than substance. And selling political campaigns ten or twenty second ads only fosters that trend. Few issues that confront Americans are so simple that they can be reduced to a few seconds of discussion.

While there has been occasional debate about funding politicians' access to air time, using approaches such as the first portion of the proposed legislation, there has been precious little of the latter. One major reason is that air time is vastly more profitable to television and radio stations when sold in ten or twenty second chunks than when sold in five, ten or sixty minute blocks. Stations are also concerned that viewers will ignore more lengthy discussion of issues and that the lower audience levels achieved by such long-form programming will depress audience levels for the programming which follows (thereby reducing ad revenue from those programs as well).

That argument would be far more convincing if we weren't living in an era when broadcast profits are at all-time highs and when one of the major television networks, NBC-TV, has announced a fall program schedule which includes a reality game show so daring that the promotional ads for the series include the type of blurred bubble over naked body parts that one might expect on a late night Howard Stern program.

Senator McCain and company deserve the gratitude of a nation for seeking to find systems that will help restore meaningful public debate over issues in lieu of immaculately coiffed ten-second candidate image ads mouthing catch phrases.

We can only hope that their fellow Senators and Representatives will sufficiently value meaningful and effective public discourse to help pass this needed legislation. IM

The Greening of a Generation

It promises to be a long, hot graduation ceremony on hard bleachers, the second one this week. A part of me hates these. They always make me cry. I imagine (and hope) it will be routine this time and, in a reasonably composed manner, I'll hug Hannah in her new white dress and hairdresser-fresh curls, then walk out into the June day and get back to work.

Then the kids—eighth graders—start giving talks about their most important thoughts and memories. One girl says she was scared when she moved here and started middle school: but on the first day, all the kids playfully competed to take her out to lunch and help her feel part of things. It changed her life. It took away her fear and made her belong. She quotes Bob Dylan's song "Dream": "We thought we could sit forever in fun, but our chances really was a million to one." She's trying to thank everyone for the love. Dang, my eyes grow moist.

A boy reads a poem about the walls between us all and how painful they are and how they should come down. I don't have any trouble remembering what he's talking about: the cliques of popular kids, of jocks, brains, hoods (as we used to call them) and those way at the bottom—the withdrawn ones no one really gets to know. We have a much better idea who they are now: abused kids, children of alcoholics, trying and failing to come close to some idea of likable and "normal." This boy is pleading for everyone to look over those walls and realize our commonness and that we all have isolation, no matter how cool we think we are. And we all need love.

I don't have a handkerchief. My chest does a little heave and a little gasp. I'm surrounded by parents and feel quite the idiot.

These kids, they're so completely innocent. They overpower with the authority of truth. They have—what? They have what adults lose—hope. I'm sitting here watching an actual display of this sheer, fleeting, near-shamanic hope, in its pure and completely genuine form—a thing you couldn't for a million dollars buy a seat to see on Broadway or in Disney TV movies (which actually are doing the best job of any to show real problems, real coping skills and real people working their way through the "stuff" of life to find real love).

Then the little student quartet plays Pachelbel's "Canon", getting most of the notes right and all of the heart and hope right. I'm actually crying now and the tears and snot are running down my face and I'm wiping it with my sleeve. Then they say they're going to play "Imagine" by John Lennon because "it really expresses our true feelings about the world we want to live in and hope to create as adults."

"Imagine there's no heaven/It's easy if you try." My god, they're saying that after being educated in our tax-supported middle school for three years? Cool. Pissing off some conservative parents, I'm sure. But I'm glad they're thinking. I'm more than glad. I feel actual joy. They see something out there in the world twenty and forty years from now, something maybe we don't see. If there's no heaven, then what have we got? This—we've got this world right here with these kids and all this hope.

"Imagine no possessions," they sing. Oh my god! There's a word for that—communism. But suddenly I am imagining no possessions. I'm seeing it how they're singing it and I don't see any problem. Of course, they'll never do that. These kids will get those degrees and SUVs and mortgages and vacations on credit cards, won't they? And they'll spend their lives working for and maintaining and storing and preening better and better stuff. But, right now, they're seeing through it all. And I'm sitting here knowing it's possible and it's right.

I want to just cry out from my place on the bleachers, do it! Don't lose that! It's what we, your parents, tried to do in the sixties and pass on to you and now doubt: did we make any freaking difference? Yes, we did it, we did what you're trying to do. Then it rises like the sun in my mind: can I even begin to imagine my generation standing here at middle school graduation and saying any of this stuff? We'd have been shamed and thrown out of school and vigorously rejected by peers as the weirdest of dorks, the uncoolest of hyper-dweebs.

So then how come these kids get to say and sing these things and not be punished and ostracized? Because, dummy, I tell myself, you and your generation changed the world. It worked. The sixties worked! It didn't so much make the world safe for pot, tie-dye and old Dylan records as it made us look at everything as if love mattered. Peace and love, brother—it worked. It's here, right in front of me, singing now. We planted a lot of unfamiliar seeds and didn't know what kind of flowers would spring from them.

Scarcely tended by mainstream culture, those seeds grew into a world of conflict resolution workshops, nuclear freezes, laws against hate crimes, mothers against drunk driving, day care at work, seat belts, adult children of alcoholics finding ways back to self-love, people talking routinely about their feelings and personal growth, creek cleanups, indoor clean air, no World War III and parents chronically hugging and saying "I love you" to their children.

After Hannah gets her diploma, that's what I do to her. "Dad," she says, looking around to see if anyone noticed, "please!" That hasn't changed. We fought for and gave them a different world, but they're still embarrassed (in public) by our love. I hope they get over it. Hey, I must have picked up some of that from them—hope! ■

Letters to the Editor

Activism is not only for the young, as these two letters indicate. Each responds to material aired on The Jefferson Exchange, JPR's daily call-in program hosted by Jeff Golden, airing on the News & Information Service each weekday from 8-10 a.m., and rebroadcast the same day at 8-10 p.m.

Today you brought Helen Caldicott to the Exchange. I managed to pick up the latter half, as interruptions kept me from hearing the whole time. I have been aware of this remarkable woman for many years.

Jeff urges his listeners to "Do what you can do!" So I spent part of my 95th birthday on the phone today. I phoned about ten people known at the RVUUF [Rogue Valley Unitarian Universalist Fellowship] for their dedication to active involvement on causes and committees. I asked—as a birthday present to me—to please listen to the replay in the evening and then try to initiate a protest expression to reinforce Helen's aim to once again get popular protestation movements started, as in the '80s. Younger guys and gals will have to provide the energy. I can do this bit.

Thanks for being—especially in my listening area. May your tribe increase.

*Lou Pollard

I think we have listened to The Jefferson Exchange from its inception. As time goes on it gets better and better and usually leaves us with something positive to think about—which is more than you can say for what usually comes over the airwaves. And for those of us in our eighties and nineties, it's the best stimulus of the day. We are grateful for the planning and hosting of each program and for tapping in to the minds and responsive hearts of so many great folk in the area.

Several weeks ago I heard mentioned on your program a disputed plan to cut down trees in an area on or near Siskiyou Blvd. [in Ashland] for the purpose of building a group of "cottages." This piqued my interest, but since I didn't get the particulars I wonder if you could tell me the source of this project and how to get more information ...

Forming Artistic Identity

In a society dominated by men and science, how do women artists begin to find self and vision?

By Victoria Christensen

"In the social jungle of human existence there is no feeling of being alive without a sense of identity."

ERIK ERIKSON

Perhaps the most problematic task facing women artists today is the formation of identity—a sense of self and life vision. Because of the high value western society has placed on objectivity and rationalism, women artists and subjective modes of being have had relatively little impact on societal values and directions. The arts are portrayed as dispensable luxuries; schools focus instead on what a scientific and technologically oriented culture views as society's major priorities.

As a woman artist, I've struggled to come to terms with my identity, and borne witness to many others who've experienced similar difficulties. Was this artistic identity something I just put on like a piece of clothing because people told me it looked good, or was it a deeper calling?

A Master's Degree in Sociology provided structure and support for my own study of 25 women artists from southern Oregon and northern Arizona. They represented a diversity of ages, social classes and educational backgrounds; all were involved in intentional creativity with materials or their bodies for expressive purposes. They included painters, print makers, sculptors, poets, creative writers, musicians, dancers, jewelry makers and performing artists.

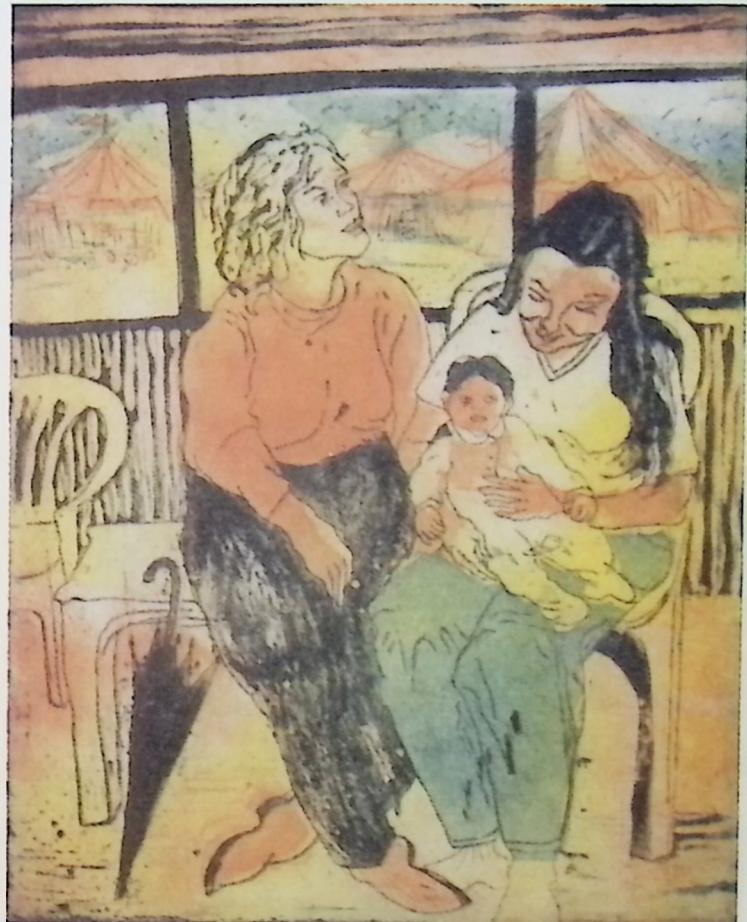

For these women, forming an artistic identity required a fine balance between inner and outer awareness; between reason and intuition. They spoke of two realities from which they received information about themselves: the external world; and the internal world of intuition, unconscious drives and other cosmic influences.

As I learned, identity first transforms from a "pre-artistic" or "naïve" identity to a "neophyte" identity, then later through the "virtuoso" and "authentic" stages. The naïve stage, where all artists begin, is an incubation period of four sequential phases: encounter, polarization, individuation and integration.

Encounter

All the women I studied tended to be "other-directed" in the encounter phase: looking outside of themselves for knowledge about who they were, and subordinating their own perceptions and judgments about themselves to others. Family, teachers and instructors, peers and significant others had influence; so did sexism, western scientific ideology, access to resources and time, and age/body issues.

Families strongly influenced the majority of women, particularly those who assumed artistic identities at an early age.

Their first creative experiences happened within that context, and family members were the first to notice and encourage or discourage artistic ability. A painter named Katrina said, "When I was little my dad noticed that I loved to draw on anything I could get my hands on. He would always call me his little artist—which, although I didn't realize it at the time, had a profound impact on my identity." Some, however, were raised in families that offered little or no support for creative endeavors. And for those who received support, it wasn't uncommon to receive it while art was still a hobby; but once they voiced an interest in pursuing a career in art, support disappeared. As Melissa noted: "Although my parents found pleasure in my musical abilities, they didn't expect it to ever go beyond a hobby and never encouraged me to pursue a career in music. My mother diverted her support when I told her I wanted to be a professional pianist. She thought it was great to play for the church choir, but to consider doing it as a career was totally out of the question. In her eyes art wasn't considered a 'real job'." Going contrary to the wishes of parental expectations caused several women an enormous amount of internal conflict and self estrangement—which made it all the more difficult to form an identity.

For those not introduced to art by family, the school system was often their first exposure to creative endeavors. Teachers and instructors played a crucial role in their identification process, particularly high school art teachers. As Shakira noted, "my dance instructor was definitely the most influential role model. She helped build my confidence by giving me constructive feedback and even helped me get into the London Dance Academy." Others mentioned teachers who provided the opportunity to "paint a mural," "enter a writing contest," or "perform in the school play," all of which enabled them to experience themselves as artists.

Photographer Dana Palmer says, "I bask in the emotion, connection and reality of human beings... In the simplest moment, we are all the same. Thank God there are cameras to document such things."

Social and cultural factors also had a profound impact. Time to delve into creative endeavors and access to resources were two obvious constraints. What to do for work aside from creative pursuits was an extremely important concern. Unless a woman was independently wealthy or supported by her parents, consistently developing creative talents would require a steady job with flexible hours. However, because so much time was devoted to making a living, time for art was constricted. Most women—especially single mothers—found it painfully difficult to juggle their creative time with work, family, social life, domestic chores, physical fitness, and so on. "I don't know how on earth, with all the expectations put on me, I can possibly be an artist," Suzanna noted. "There just isn't any time to do art. I'm always having to pay attention to everyone else's needs and rarely do I have a chance to take care of myself."

Social class determined not only access to resources, but available creative opportunities. One woman who grew up in poverty explained how she wanted to be a dancer in high school, but the school she was attending didn't offer dance, nor did her parents "have the money to afford private dance classes." However, for women from the middle to upper-middle class, the situation was quite different. One woman from a privileged family confidently stated, "there was never any question of me not pursuing art. I always had the support I needed, both socially and financially." Parents and significant others supported her creative pursuits by giving her art supplies. She had access to quality education and private art lessons.

Several women pointed to Western ideology as a constraint—particularly patriarchal beliefs and ideologies that have contributed to the oppression of women artists. Those most aware of sexism as a cultural constraint tended to be educated, working women, and single mothers. Most assumed that if they chose to be artists it would inevitably be an uphill battle. As Monica put it: "It's hard enough being a woman in our society, much less a woman artist. Because there are so many stereotypes of women as irrational—and of artists as neurotic flakes—people automatically assume you're less qualified. I'm sure if I went around telling everyone I was a male scientist I would receive instant credibility, but as a woman artist, I have to work that much harder for respect and recognition."

Those women with work force experience had quickly discovered that our culture champions science and technology over the arts simply because there are fewer job opportunities for artists. "It is a human tragedy artists aren't supported like they should be," Harriet pointed out. "Artists are like canaries in the coal mine. They bring color and spice to a dull, mechanistic world. It would be a living hell without artists, but because we live in a scientifically oriented culture, the blessings artists bestow are unappreciated. Art is considered frivolous by most people."

It was particularly heartbreaking to learn that in the educational institutions most women attended, the arts were ignored. Several respondents admitted feeling forced to conform to a rational, analytical mode of learning. As Kimberly noted, "In school I was always encouraged to do everything but art. My advisors would tell me to take more math and science, but not once was I encouraged to take more art. This gave me the impression that it wasn't okay to be an artist. I was forced to fit into this mold that never quite worked for me."

Many women held the belief that we're born with creative abilities; but that we're taught to become desensitized. Catie, a painter and writer, said, "I feel like we all have been deformed and inhibited by our socialization process. As we get older, we're taught to become insensitive and unimaginative—to shut our creative centers down in order to assimilate to society. We are forced to accept a social concept of normality which excludes the free expression of creative imagination."

Polarization

A woman artist self-consciously selects and unconsciously internalizes cues about herself, which at some point become internally inconsistent, or polarized. In my study, most women agreed there was a point when they struggled with contradictory messages about themselves, which caused internal conflict and feelings of anxiety. The degree of polarization was contingent on the degree to which they internalized conflicting messages about themselves. Those who internalized high degrees of polarization experienced more difficulty in forming an artistic identity.

A multitude of themes reflected polarized thinking in the women's self perceptions. Several women expressed confusion over contradictory demands of individualism and conformity. While they were encouraged to be unique individuals who possessed freedom of thought and action, they were also encouraged to act in accordance with established rules and standards. As one woman expressed, "My parents taught me to conform to societal expectations and avoid taking risks at all costs. Yet, I was also encouraged to take chances, to be unique, and think for myself. This inevitably created a schism in my self perceptions and caused me an enormous amount of internal conflict."

While most agreed that success was something they valued and hoped to achieve, the decision to assume an artistic identity opposes the success themes emphasized in contemporary western culture. Because women have to contend with the media image of the successful career woman, they are given the message that they too should attain a certain level of success—and that choosing the path of an artist would be going against what society defines as successful. "I have received blatant messages at various times in my life that choosing to be an artist isn't a socially acceptable career, which created all of this internal conflict," Shelly said. "I could either choose to be an artist, which might mean being locked in and committed to a path that would require an enormous amount of risk and self-sacrifice or choose to deny my desires in order to conform to a socially acceptable path of success."

Another polarizing theme was conflict between self and other. The majority of the women, particularly mothers, experienced conflicts between female values they were socialized to adhere to—motherhood, selflessness, nurturing and passivity—and patriarchal values promoting personal gain, autonomy, competition and success. While several valued personal, creative space, they also had a difficult time imagining how they could give themselves over to

CHAMPIONS SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY OVER
THE ARTS SIMPLY BECAUSE THERE ARE FEWER JOB OPPORTUNITIES FOR

creative work without excluding everything else. As Julie put it, "If I am going to be an artist, a true artist, certain aspects of my family life, including my husband, would have to be abandoned." She was ambivalent about being an artist because she thought she might have to sacrifice more than she could sacrifice for art. To her, being an artist meant that she would "never be able to close the door," as it seemed the true artist had to do. She thought the path seemed too "intense" and "draining" for her, given all the other things she wanted to do, like raise a family. She felt she couldn't win. If she acted in accord with the dominant values of the culture, she would be faulted for not being a "good woman," for being "unnatural," for being hard and uncaring; if instead, she followed the cultural dictates for being a good woman, she would risk being devalued by the culture.

Individuation

To maintain a sense of sanity, a woman artist is forced to detach from external influences in order to privately make sense out of conflicting messages she's internalized. Her ability to establish autonomy is contingent on a shift from being outer-directed to inner-directed, an ability to become conscious of desire through reliance on internal cues, and an ability to distinguish others' values from her own.

At some point, each woman has to come to the realization that too much reliance on others for self-definition is detrimental. As one woman noted, "Too much focus outside of myself made me feel out of touch with myself. I came to realize that no one else had the answers. No one else had knowledge that I didn't have. All I really needed to do was shut out the external voices for awhile so I could get in touch with my internal experiences, my internal truth, my internal desires." Ability to establish a sense of autonomy and resolve internal conflict is dependent on ability to discern desires. The process of paying attention to how one experiences herself sensitizes her to internal, intuitive cues, which inevitably serve as a confirmation of desire.

In the women's experiences, intuitive cues occurred on physical, emotional, intellectual and spiritual levels, triggered by seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting and touching, most likely during the creative act. The sensations acted as catalysts. Some women recalled intense moments when they experienced clear physical and neurological changes: a quickened heart beat, dizziness, a loss of time and appetite, electric shocks throughout the body, butterflies in the belly.

Some also spoke of intense, psychological experiences as emotional cues. Several mentioned feeling entranced by a feeling of "flow," which was described in almost identical terms by various women, regardless of the activity that produced it. They described this state as a highly focused state of consciousness where action felt automatic and effortless. A creative writer described her interpretation of flow: "There have been those moments when I'm writing where everything is jelling—flowing in a continuous train of thought. I'm totally immersed in my work—concentrating on the characters, on how the story is evolving, on the words that are coming out. I've completely lost my sense of time and completely enraptured and caught up in what I'm doing. I can be so saturated

Bats

Scan the skyline about dark on a warm summer evening and you may see small, winged, swallow-sized animals flying about in a most unbirdlike fashion. They are flying mammals: bats, easily recognized but much maligned, and poorly understood. For many humans, bats evoke fear and repulsion based on fable, myth and ignorance.

Bats are a distinct group with more members than any other mammal assemblage except rodents. Of the 40 different species of bats found in North America, north of Mexico, 15 are found in Oregon and northern California. Like other mammals, including humans, bats possess hair, milk glands, and give live birth. Unlike other mammals, they have wings and are capable of true flight. Their wings are formed by a double layer of skin stretched over the arm and elongated fingers. The membrane also extends to the hind legs and, in most species, between the legs and connecting with the tail. These membranes are not only used for flying, but also as a scoop for capturing insects in flight.

Some bat myths: Bats are blind. Not so. Bats see well enough for on-site selection of a roost spot and in certain interactions with other bats. But bats are nocturnal. How can they capture prey or avoid flying into things in the dark? Bats get around by echolocation. They emit ultrasonic sound waves, above the range of human hearing, which bounce off solid objects, including moving insect prey. The sound bounces or echoes back to their highly sensitive ears, and their brain interprets size and distance and location from what is heard. Bats' ability to function in total darkness makes them alien and mysterious to many of us.

Bats do not have a special liking for women's hair. They might accidentally touch human hair while pursuing small insect prey, or while maneuvering in a small cave or room, but they have no special liking.

Bats do not all live in caves. One of our bats uses caves during daytime, and one uses the foliage of trees. The other species rest in crevices or cavities in trees or rocks, or, to the dismay of some humans, in similar cracks and crannies of buildings and bridges. If you try to exclude the bats by sealing up their entries, make sure the bats are out, not in.

All bats do not carry rabies. In fact, less than 1/2 of 1% of bats—no more than any other wild mammal—carry the disease, and chances of contact are extremely small. Bats that are flopping around on the ground or engaged in feeble mid-day flight are probably sick and should be avoided.

More enlightened people try to attract bats to their homes or nearby environs by putting up carefully designed bat houses, because we know that bats are natural insecticides that consume literally millions of insects. So look beyond Dracula, vampires, and Batman and see bats for what they are—unique and interesting mammals that play a vital role in the web of life on this planet.

Britt Festivals Dances Into Its 40th Year

By Kelly Gonzales

Now in its 40th year, Jacksonville's Britt Festivals has become one of the Pacific Northwest's premiere outdoor summer performing arts festivals. As most local residents are aware, Britt is located in the historic gold rush town of Jacksonville, and presents dozens of summer concerts, featuring world-class artists in jazz, folk, country, pop, dance, and classical music. The concerts are presented and sponsored by the Peter Britt Gardens Music & Arts Festival Association. Dance enthusiasts will be especially pleased this year with the three outstanding dance performances scheduled in August.

The Séan Curran Company performs on Thursday, August 22 at 8:30 p.m. Séan Curran was a favorite dancer of the Bill T. Jones/Arnie Zane Dance Company for 10 years and a former cast member of STOMP. Curran's contemporary dance company presents dances featuring his signature virtuosity, complex musicality and powerful emotion. With scores ranging from traditional Irish Mouth Music, early 20th Century chamber music, to contemporary composers such as Sheila Chandra and Seamus Egan, the company's eclectic repertory includes group works as well as Curran's renowned solos.

Curran has attained national recognition with his second commission for Trinity Irish Dance Company and his choreography for the Broadway show, James Joyce's The Dead. He received a New York Dance and Performance Bessie Award for his performance in Secret Pleasures.

The Suzee Grilley Dance Ensemble graces the Britt stage next, on Friday, August 23 at 8 p.m. Founded in 2001 by Suzee Grilley (former member of Nikolais Dance Theatre with whom she toured the world), the Suzee Grilley Dance Ensemble features a dynamic and emotionally rich collection of dance works. Grilley's work often integrates the circular, sweeping and upside down movements of capoeira.

The Suzee Grilley Dance Ensemble (SGDE) is comprised of women 14 to 42 years old. Although of various backgrounds their common ground is a love of dance, athleticism and kinetic exuberance. Grilley's choreography explores the personal and the universal, the entertaining and the evocative.

On Saturday, August 24 at 8 p.m., Dayton Contemporary Dance Company and The Dirty Dozen Brass Band present an exhilarating evening of live New Orleans brass band jazz music and contemporary modern dance, appropriately entitled When the Spirit Moves. They perform a series of vignettes celebrating the lineage and essence from which these two uniquely American forms of contemporary art emerged, and shaped by the rich culture of New Orleans—a culture where African influenced traditions have remained largely intact.

Founded in 1968, DCDC is the oldest modern dance company in Ohio and one of the largest companies of its kind between Chicago and New York City. They have won national and international acclaim and are renowned for powerful, artistic performances, a diverse repertoire of works by world class choreographers, and excellence in educational programming.

The Dirty Dozen Brass Band has been changing the face of traditional brass bands for more than 30 years. The group blends traditional jazz with R&B, bebop, funk and pop to create a distinctive sound that includes interweaving horn lines, explosive solo breaks and a funky back beat.

Bluetooth Bites and Cellular Teeth

Besides a few bad puns, I've got a couple of new technological advancements for you to chew on. They both incorporate teeth, one quite literally, the other having something to do with a 10th century Viking who reportedly ate far too many blueberries. Both of these technologies are going to change the way we live, work and communicate. Some of you will find all this to be quite exciting and cool; others may simply say, "Wow, the future really bites."

The Viking in question was Harald Blåtand. I have no idea how his last name is pronounced nor what the little circle above the "a" is for, but loosely translated out of Danish his name supposedly means "Bluetooth". Old Bluetooth is credited with uniting Denmark and Norway. He may have gotten his name because of his dark hair (quite rare for a Viking), but according to popular legend, he got his name because of his blue teeth, which had become stained from eating more blueberries than a bird. Whether it was his dark hair or the blueberries, we'll never really know for sure, but that doesn't matter. What matters is that eleven centuries later, a Swedish-based company called Ericsson began spearheading the development and implementation of a new technology with the curious name of Bluetooth™. Bluetooth is a wireless technology that uses short-range radio signals to transmit data across short distances, promising to simplify communication and synchronization between digital devices. According to Ericsson's Web site, www.ericsson.com, "The [Bluetooth] technology will replace many of the proprietary cables we use in the home and office to connect devices together: telephones, printers, PDAs, desktop and laptop computers, fax machines, keyboards, joysticks—almost any digital device that uses the Bluetooth wireless technology chip will be able to take advantage of the technology."

When I first heard about Bluetooth several years ago, I remember thinking, "Big deal. Another hyped up wireless technology with a goofy name." But Bluetooth has survived its initial hype, matured into a technology standard, and is finally poised to sink its technical teeth into a worldwide market. Why am I so excited about Bluetooth? Because I hate the tangle of cables that make up the last few feet of computing. I hate crawling around under desks, fishing for keyboard and mouse cables then blindly plugging them into the backs of computers. The undersides of desks are dark, dirty and disgusting places populated by dust, hair, fingernail clippings, food crumbs, boogers and other gross material that I sincerely wish none of the aspiring computer professionals who follow me will ever have to encounter. Bluetooth comes a few years too late for me, but it may save others from these horrors. With Bluetooth, all peripherals would "automagically" communicate wirelessly with the CPU and with one another.

There are many other applications of Bluetooth. My cell phone has a headset, which is very handy when I'm talking on my cell phone and want to be doing something else too, like driving. The problem, however, is the pesky wire that connects the headset to my phone. It gets twisted and caught in the seatbelt and easily unplugged from the phone. I have already contemplated the near-comic irony of getting in a car accident while fiddling with my "hands-free" headset. Bluetooth gets rid of this pesky wire. The headset communicates wirelessly with the cell phone.

IS COMING TO

A MOUTH NEAR YOU.

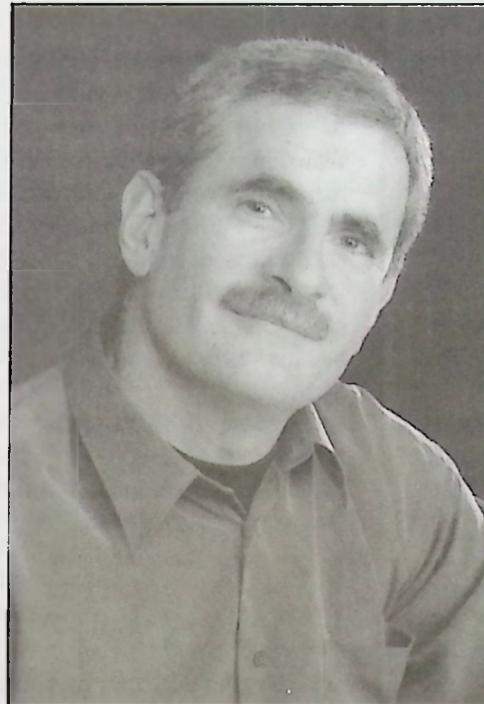

Bluetooth promises an automated, wireless and seamless future. With Bluetooth, you could walk past a restaurant and get the menu along with the day's specials delivered directly to your cell phone or PDA. You could place your order before you even got seated. With Bluetooth, you could go to the grocery store, load up your groceries and just walk out the door. How could this be? Because all the products you've selected have a Bluetooth wireless chip embedded in their packaging that has already wirelessly transmitted the price and quantity to the "checkstand". Your debit/credit card also has a Bluetooth chip in it that wirelessly processes payment as you leave the premises. In addition, the grocery store's product inventory is instantly updated. When quantity for a particular product goes below a predefined level, new product is automatically ordered. Oh, and if you decide to walk out of the store without paying, good luck trying to get away with it as the items you've stolen will communicate their location to Bluetooth wireless chips embedded in every traffic light.

The world of wireless communication begins to get really interesting when Bluetooth technology gets incorporated into a real tooth. No, I'm not making this stuff up. A new design for a tooth implant that receives signals from radios and cell phones is currently on display at the Science Museum in London. "Installation" of this technology will supposedly be a "relatively minor procedure" with a micro-vibration device and a wireless receiver being implanted into a natural tooth during routine dental surgery. With your jawbone serving as an antenna, sounds are transferred from the receiver-tooth into the inner ear by bone resonance. Music, cellular communications, alarm clock, news, etc., could all be piped directly to the inner ear without any external sounds. The receiver implant is designed to work in tandem with either a dedicated device or a modified cell phone that would pick up the long distance signals and transmit local signals to the receiver-tooth. Bluetooth is what would enable all the short distance communication between the receiver-tooth and other devices. As with all technology, however, there could be drawbacks. "We realize that having unwanted sound information arriving directly into the user's brain could resemble technological schizophrenia, therefore

ON THE SCENE

Felicia Thomas-Lynn

Reporting from the World's Danger Spots

National Public Radio correspondent Jacki Lyden says she is at a wonderful place in her life. Lyden, a Waukesha County native, is a foreign correspondent for NPR and alternate weekend host of All Things Considered. Her critically acclaimed memoir, "Daughter of the Queen of Sheba," is being made into a movie, with Meryl Streep portraying her mother and Gwyneth Paltrow as Lyden. Lyden began her career with NPR in Chicago in 1981 and has covered stories including the American farm crisis, the conflict in Northern Ireland and most recently the war in Afghanistan.

Q. You covered the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center. What was that experience like?

A. From the very first moment, I was called by my brother who lives in Delafield [Wisconsin]. I was home in Brooklyn. My direct line of sight out of my back window was the World Trade towers. I could see the smoke. I bicycled over there. It was sort of like being in an accident and not losing consciousness. It was horrifying, almost incomprehensible, but on one hand I was not surprised that something awful had happened here. I had been to a lot of places where unthinkable, awful things had happened.

Q. You recently covered the war in Afghanistan. Were you ever in any immediate danger? As a female journalist, was it difficult to get information?

A. I don't think I was in any immediate danger. Kabul isn't a particularly threatening environment. However, I think we had a little more sense of security than we should have, looking back. When I got there, the Taliban hadn't even been gone a month. I felt like it was the other end of ground zero. It was very interesting. Over and over, I feel that it is a plus to be a female journalist. In so many of these cultures, you get access to the women in a way that men don't. The women tell you a story beyond where the front line is.

Q. Did you have any input into the movie being made from your book?

A. Yes. I've been working pretty closely with the scriptwriter. I've had a chance to look at the script and object to things that I frankly didn't think worked. I've been really privileged. They've done an amazing adaptation. I hope to have a cameo role.

Q. You appeared, along with your mother, on the Oprah Winfrey talk show to discuss your book, and what it was like growing up with a manic-depressive mother. What was being on the show like?

A. It was very amazing. In terms of American podiums, Oprah has absolutely one of the best pulpits. To be there was a really heavy experience. I have to say, though, that I was frustrated. She could have done much more on the topic of undiagnosed mental illness and how that affects the family. It was odd. I was pleased that we had reached so many viewers and yet, I really didn't feel that I could make as persuasive of a case as I wanted to.

Q. Where do you see yourself 10 years from now?

A. I want New York to remain my personal capital. I'm very much living the life that I want to live. I'm working on another book right now. It's "Lost and Found in Baghdad." It's going to go over about 15 years of travel to the Middle East and other places. It's not so much about the wars or the conflicts. It's about the people who make your life whole in each of these places. It's kind of about finding yourself in places where you mostly feel lost.

ARTISTIC IDENTITY

in it that there's no future or past... just being in the moment without any regard for the words I'm using."

Some even recalled profound transcendental experiences or spiritual cues, which strongly influenced the shaping of their identities. Those who experienced these intuitive cues believed the source was cosmic, which the women referred to as "the Divine," "God/Goddess," "Muse," "Spirit Guides," and "the Universe." These spiritual cues spoke to women in different ways. Some experienced them during the creative act; others received clear signs or messages in life circumstances. A poet described a transcendental experience she had while walking in the park: "It was a moderate spring morning, and I was thinking about my life—not sure about what I wanted to do—and feeling a lump and cry in my chest and I just let it go, accepted it and the sadness and pain attached to it. I saw a large elm tree next to me and stopped for a minute and touched the coarse bark and looked up into its spreading branches high above me, and started making up a poem about needing a tree for a friend at forty... and I kept walking, making up the poem. And within a few minutes I was caught up in awe of the beauty and larger goodness of life and felt very happy and full and grateful and aware of God's presence in my life then and always. I knew at that moment that there is love and hope. All the words that came to me were so potent and loving...they spoke to me as if they were not my own. It was as if this loving essence was speaking to me through the poem and was trying to show me that the need to express myself through poetry is what I truly desire—it is what my soul calls me to do."

To establish a sense of autonomy, a woman has to become aware that she's a product of social programming to distinguish internalized beliefs of others from her own. One woman said, "I remember a point in my life when I had to really work hard to break out of my conditioning. It was like busting through a thick shell. It was difficult and painful at times, but it completely changed my self perceptions." Ability to become conscious of desire through intuitive cues allows a woman to know what it is she values, in contrast to what others or society values. Her ability to individuate enables her to become autonomous in decision making.

Integration

Cultivation of new beliefs and values allows for a consecration of conflicting polarities. To merge inner and outer awareness, though, another shift has to occur, from inner-directed to inner- and outer-directed. By bridging submerged emotions, intent, and desire with the intellectual, objective, social world, an artist is able to bridge the chasm between self and world. However, before she can fully integrate an artistic identity, she has to first empower herself with choice and transcend limiting either/or, polarized beliefs. "So often we want to create something, but we choose beliefs that actually sabotage our success," Monica explained. "I finally came to realize that I wasn't a victim of circumstance; rather, I had the power to choose who I wanted to be and how I wanted to define my life. Thus, I made a conscious decision to choose art, because if I didn't, my creativity would have been devoured."

By cultivating new values and beliefs that allow for integration, an artist avoids false dichotomies. For instance, instead of remaining stuck in the polarized belief that individuality would be sacrificed by conforming to society's rules and expectations, some women came to realize that becoming an artist required a mixture of both conformity and non-conformity. They came to realize that although they had to conform to society's standards in order to accomplish certain tasks, it was important to remain autonomous in order to sustain creative energy. Also, some completely redefined what success meant to them. Rather than defining success as synonymous with accumulating material possessions and status, they chose to base their definition on more attainable things such as internal contentment and personal happiness. They learned to accept failure as a necessary part of their success as artists.

THE FABRIC OF LIFE
ITSELF HELPS TO
RESOLVE THE CONFLICT
BETWEEN THE DEMANDS OF THE WORLD AND INTERNAL DESIRES.

Integrating an identity also means choosing beliefs that bridge the gap between self and other. Rather than succumb to selfless conditioning that says women should deprive themselves of their own needs in order to meet the needs of others, some found other ways of being an artist and a woman. For example, integrating art into the fabric of life itself helped to resolve the conflict between the demands of the world and internal desires. "I've come to accept that there is no creativity apart from the demands of life," one said. "They are embedded in each other." Alongside concern for self and art, other related concerns need to be attended to.

An artistic identity is born when a subconscious synthesis between self and world occurs, which forces the identity to emerge into conscious awareness. It is in this breakthrough moment when the naïve artist becomes the neophyte.

An artist's commitment to her new identity is fickle, though. The neophyte, by and large, is still not developed enough as an artist to fully assimilate her new identity. And an artistic identity is never fixed, but continues to evolve. Like any other pursuit, dedication and commitment is required to experience its deeper and more complex aspects—to reach the virtuoso and the authentic stages.

For these twenty five women, art and the process of becoming an artist was intensely important. Each possessed a deep need to understand self and world, and art was a means to do so.

My research suggests that we must begin to think dialectically about identity; that identity exists in a system of influences and requires the complex coordination of these influences. The formation of identity is a natural, inherent and subjective process; it is also inseparably intertwined with social reality. It is both self-created and socially constructed.

CLASSICS & NEWS SERVICE KSOR/KSRS/KNYR/KSRG/KOOZ/KNHT

Each week until the return of the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts at the end of November, host Don Matthews will present great operas from the library of JPR, from his own collection, and from opera lovers in the State of Jefferson. The season includes such classic recordings as La Fille du Régiment with Joan Sutherland and Luciano Pavorotti; Peter Grimes with Jon Vickers; and the 1957 recording of Der Rosenkavalier with Elizabeth Schwarzkopf as the Marchallin and Herbert von Karajan conducting. Also featured are lesser-known works such as Ruy Blas by Filippo Marchetti and Handel's last Italian opera Deidamia. Tune in Saturday mornings at 10:30 a.m.

News & Information Service KSJK / KAGI / KTBR / KRVM

The Healing Arts, hosted by JPR's Colleen Pyke, has begun its new expanded format on Sundays at 5 p.m., as part of a medical block of programming. This month, each full-hour program will feature conversations with very different authors. One week, Colleen will talk with Barbara Glacel, PhD, author of Hitting the Wall: Memoir of a Cancer Journey. Dr. Glacel was diagnosed with breast cancer while she and her husband were stationed in Belgium. A successful businesswoman, Glacel tells the story of living with cancer and having surgery in a foreign land. Susan Weed, herbalist and author of Menopausal Years, is another of Colleen's guests; she'll give listeners tips on how to proactively approach that changing time of life. And Mary Rose O'Reilly, self-proclaimed "Quaker Buddhist Farmer," talks with Colleen about her journey into self-discovery while living on a sheep ranch and studying Buddhism in France. The Healing Arts follows Zorba Paster on Your Health each week on the News & Information Service.

Volunteer Profile: Kay Tamashiro

Originally from Kauai, Hawaii, Kay relocated to Ashland to attend Southern Oregon University. She recently earned her degree in Music/Business, and is interning at The Britt Festivals in Jacksonville. She's been volunteering at Jefferson Public Radio for a little over a year; currently, she's rebroadcast engineer for The Jefferson Daily each Wednesday evening.

Kay says what drew her to JPR was the Classics & News Service. She says, "I volunteered during my first year in college, and learned so much history behind various composers. It was great, because I'd grown up playing classical music on the piano. Hearing the background of the composers, and their music, was enriching."

HIGHLIGHTS

Marian McPartland's Piano Jazz

August 4 · Harry Pickens

Pianist Harry Pickens combines music-making with powerful insight into jazz. He has performed with James Moody, Milt Jackson, and Wallace Roney. Pickens explores tunes as poetry, using textures and harmony to "unfold" words. His belief in the spirit of improvisation is evident as he creates a "Blues for Marian." McPartland joins him to create their own version of "Giant Steps."

August 11 · Cecilia Smith

Vibraphonist Cecilia Smith is a leading proponent of the Four Mallet Technique. She has performed with Cassandra Wilson, Mark Whitfield and Randy Weston, among others. She and McPartland combine their talents as they improvise on "Old Devil Moon." Smith also shows off her own compositions on "Lullaby for Miles and Bill," and a piece dedicated to her mother, "Mourning Before Grace."

Jim Hightower discusses Plutocracy, Globaloney, Populism and Democracy with hosts Michael and Justine Toms on New Dimensions on August 4.

August 18 · Ralph Sutton

Piano Jazz remembers pianist Ralph Sutton with this encore broadcast from 1986. He and McPartland reminisce about their fifty-year friendship in jazz. He solos on two Fats Waller tunes "Viper's Drag" and "Alligator Crawl," which he made famous. Together with host McPartland they play a Willard Robison medley including "Guess I'll Go Back Home This Summer," "Deep Summer Music," and "Taint So."

August 25 · Monica Mancini

Vocalist Monica Mancini debuted in the Henry Mancini Chorus and spent more than two decades as a backup singer before emerging as a solo performer. Influenced by her famous father's songs and her mother Ginny Simms' vocal arrangements, Monica Mancini's phrasing, style, and sound are undoubtedly her own. She joins McPartland to celebrate the family legacy with classic Mancini tunes like "Moment to Moment," "Dear Heart," and "Two for the Road."

August 4 · Where to Next?

After exploring every nook and cranny of this music in the course of one thousand episodes of The Thistle & Shamrock, this week we'll listen to some emerging trends and new names.

August 11 · Western Lilt

Hear music from Lewis, Skye, Barra, and other locations in the Western Isles of Scotland this week. Gaelic singer Maggie MacInnes makes a welcome return to The Thistle & Shamrock to introduce us to her latest recording.

August 18 · Time to Dance

The infectious rhythms of Celtic music were always intended to bring you to your feet and set you dancing. Limber up for this hour of music, featuring Alasdair Fraser, Trian, and a pair of traditional dance bands from Ireland and Scotland.

August 25 · Pipes 101

The Irish uilleann pipes, Scottish lowland pipes, and bagpipes from Brittany in France, and Galicia in Spain are all cousins to each other and to the best known of all such instruments: the Great Highland Pipes of Scotland. We'll listen through the varied music of the pipes with Davy Spillane, Hamish Moore, Carlos Nunez, and as many more pipers as we can fit.

BLACKENED CHICKEN SALAD (Makes 4 Servings)

1/2 med red onion, chopped

1/4 cup chicken broth

1/2 tsp white pepper

2 tbsp Balsamic vinegar

1/2 tsp ground red pepper

1 tsp cornstarch

1/2 tsp coarse black pepper

4 tsp Dijon mustard

1/2 tsp oregano

1 tsp extra virgin olive oil

1/2 tsp thyme

1/4 tsp salt

1/2 tsp basil

8 cups Romaine lettuce leaves

2 cloves garlic, chopped

1 cup red bell pepper, chopped

4 oz. chicken breasts, skinned & boned

1 small can mandarin orange segments

canola or olive oil cooking spray

In medium bowl, combine onion, white and red and black pepper, oregano, thyme, basil, and garlic; stir well. Rub spices on chicken. Coat large cast-iron skillet with cooking spray, and place over high heat. When skillet is hot, add chicken; cook each side 3 minutes to blacken. Remove chicken, and cool. Cut chicken crosswise into thin slices; set aside.

In small saucepan, combine broth, vinegar and cornstarch; stir well. Bring to boil, over medium heat. Cook for 1 minute, stirring constantly. Remove from heat; stir in mustard, olive oil, and salt. In large bowl, combine chicken, vinegar mixture, lettuce and bell pepper; toss until well coated. Top with mandarin oranges, and serve.

Clever Musical Miniatures

The American composer Leroy Anderson (1908-1975) is the O. Henry of the music world. He came out with one short, clever, successful orchestral miniature after another, but almost never tried his hand at anything larger. O. Henry wrote one short, clever, successful story after another, and never published a novel.

But there the points of similarity end. O. Henry, who was born in North Carolina in 1862, had minimal formal education. Anderson, who was born and raised in Cambridge, Mass., was educated in the local schools, including Harvard, from which he received his B.A. (Magna cum laude) and M.A. in music.

Anderson, the son of Swedish immigrant parents, led an exemplary life. O. Henry, whose real name was William Sydney Porter, was sentenced to five years in jail for embezzling funds from a bank for which he had worked. Three years and about a dozen short stories later, Porter emerged from prison as "O. Henry" to help hide his true identity. He moved to New York City, where over the next ten years before his death in 1910, he published over 300 stories and gained worldwide acclaim as America's favorite short story writer.

Anderson certainly deserves worldwide acclaim as America's favorite orchestral miniature composer. And it all started with his first music lessons from his mother, who was a church organist.

At the age of just 11, Leroy Anderson (whose real name was Leroy Anderson) began piano studies at the New England Conservatory of Music. For his high school graduation he wrote, orchestrated and conducted the class song. Next came Harvard, where he wrote arrangements for the Harvard Band which are still played today.

In 1936 he was asked to make an arrangement for the Boston Pops Orchestra, the first of many he was to do for them. Arthur Fiedler, the conductor, encouraged him to bring him an original work. The result was "Jazz Pizzicato," Anderson's first composition. The Pops premiered it in 1938.

Anderson spent World War II in the Army Counter-Intelligence Corps, where his proficiency in German and Scandinavian languages served him well. "The Syncopated Clock," one of his most famous compositions, dates from this period. I would nominate this piece and Anderson's "The Typewriter" as two of the wittiest and cleverest musical compositions in the orchestral repertoire.

Shortly after the war, Anderson wrote another of his most famous, now classic compositions: "Sleigh Ride." It was written during a heat wave and had nothing at all to do with Christmas—just winter. Nevertheless, it has reappeared during the Christmas season ever since.

Anderson conducted his own orchestra from 1950 to 1962. He gave the first performances of many of his pieces at the same time as they were being recorded.

In 1952 "Blue Tango," one of his finest orchestral works, became the top "single" of the year. It was No. 1 on the Hit Parade for 22 weeks. Anderson's own recording of it earned him a gold record, which was unprecedented for an instrumental symphonic recording.

What about longer orchestral compositions? Well, Anderson tried one, and I think it came out very well, but he evidently didn't agree with me. He composed Piano Concerto in C in 1953 and conducted its first performances in Chicago and Cleveland. But he then withdrew the work, intending to improve it, which he never did. His family decided to publish the work as the composer had originally written it, and I'm very glad they did. It is available on compact disc with Stewart Goodyear at the piano and the Cincinnati Pops conducted by Erich Kunzel (Telarc CD 80112).

Anderson also made one attempt at writing the music for a Broadway show. His music was successful, but the show, Goldilocks, only lasted for 158 performances. The original cast album is still available on compact disc (Sony Broadway CD/SC 48222).

Although lacking in long-form orchestral output, Anderson did compose two longer symphonic arrangements called A Christmas Festival and Irish Suite which have earned a permanent place in the repertoires of many orchestras.

Every red-blooded American record collection should have at least one all-Anderson CD. I have three which I can recommend: Naxos American Classics (8.559125) features Richard Hayman and his Orchestra, and includes "The Syncopated Clock," "The Typewriter," "Trumpeter's Lullaby," "Fiddle Faddle," "Blue Tango," "Bugler's Holiday," "The Waltzing Cat," "Plink, Plank, Plunk!," "Belle of the Ball" and "Sleigh Ride," plus several other selections.

These pieces are also included on RCA Victor's Red Seal recording (9026-68048-2) with the Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra conducted by Leonard Slatkin. That CD wins the award for the cleverest cover, which features a cartoon typewriter with parts that seem to move as you shake the jewel box.

RCA Victor also has a version of Leroy Anderson's Greatest Hits with the Boston Pops Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler (9026-61237-2). This includes Irish Suite, taking more than 21 minutes of the 63-minute recording.

Leroy Anderson's music is so familiar. It has been used for theme music on television programs, as musical transitions on All Things Considered, as background music in elevators and doctor's offices. Music that familiar risks being taken for granted and not being appreciated for its true quality...and cleverness.

So, do me a favor. Don't put on Leroy Anderson as you read O. Henry's short stories. You'll enjoy each much more if you give them both your undivided attention.

Cheap Jack Communities

Gold camps popped up overnight. They were known as "cheap jack municipalities."

Every time there was a gold strike, or rumors of one, a bustling camp would appear. They were built with whatever could be found. Since there were no roads, what was brought in was on horse or mule, but the miners were creative people. A brush hut could be made with four corner posts covered with leafy brush wood. The sides might be roughly woven. Another man might make a shelter by erecting a ridge pole leaning against a tree. This he covered with a blanket or sloping sticks and brush. Sometimes a shelter was only carved out of overhanging branches. In good weather, no shelter was needed.

Once established, a cheap jack community would quickly attract a store keeper. One of his first items for sale would be muslin. The muslin made more pretentious tents possible. When cut lumber became available, muslin covered the wooden house frames. These would be painted on the outside and give the appearance of a substantial building.

The paths that were left between tents could hardly be called streets or roads. It would take some later planner to lay out a town and sell house plots, but it rarely happened that a cheap jack municipality lasted long enough for this to happen.

Farm Security Administration

During the Great Depression, the Farm Security Administration set up tent camps for migrant workers. It was said the idea for the camps came from an ex-circus man who was accustomed to traveling homes. These tent towns were mobile and set up at harvest time as temporary homes for laborers. One tent acted as an office where local farmers could call in when they needed workers.

Tent towns such as these inspired advancement in outdoor toilets. A concrete catch basin was formed in the toilet pit. A little water was added. Yeast cakes were dissolved and added to the water which in turn worked on the waste, keeping it odorless and pure.

Poker Bar

Poker was the gold miners' choice of games, as can be attested to by the number of places they named "Poker." Bret Harte made the name famous by publishing The Outcasts of Poker Flat. There were several Poker Flats, but his Poker Flat was entirely fictional.

Poker Bar, in Siskiyou County, started out as Polka Bar, when a German company mined here in 1856. There were also Poker Camp, Poker Creek and just plain Poker. All have ceased to exist or have changed their names to something considered more respectable.

Sisson

Berryvale, California was on the old North South road used by the Hudson Bay trappers and later by the mules trains that supplied the miners. When a railroad was proposed, J.H. Sisson donated land. The Berryvale post office was moved and the town renamed Sisson.

Sisson became a boom town, furnishing lumber for the railroad, and it continued exporting lumber. It was well-known for its saloons. The Sisson newspaper, The Mascot, reported in 1891 that Sisson had one saloon for every forty people. Some saloons were connected with hotels, others with brothels. Some were elegant establishments, while many were small and of short duration.

The 1981 edition of The Siskiyou Pioneer lists seventy-two licensed saloons for Sisson and apologizes that the list is "probably not complete."

J.H. Sisson was a Quaker. The Quakers were opposed to alcohol. This was not a problem for J.H.. Records show that he ran a saloon called Sisson's Station, but the liquor license was registered in his wife's name.

Summer's Ritual

The summer solstice in Ashland makes me think of those spring festivals of Dionysius in ancient Greece, when audiences packed the amphitheatre for marathon performances—trilogies of tragedies, each followed by the comic relief of a raucous satyr play. Here the opening of the Elizabethan Theatre challenges drama devotees with three new Shakespeare productions, while up the street, the Oregon Cabaret Theatre offers to cap things off with song, dance, and pure fun, not to mention fabulous desserts.

This season's OSF trio—Titus Andronicus, As You Like It, and The Winter's Tale—spans the Bard's career. The very early Titus, Shakespeare's stab at the popular revenge play, relies heavily on static declamation and a manic plot that herds the characters along from one act of extravagant violence to another. Yet this worthy production uncovers much more than just evidence of future playwriting greatness. Directed by Jim Edmondson with both intelligence and heart, of all things, it highlights the pathos of a humankind ruled by aggression and revenge. William Langan compels our interest as Titus, the old soldier whose notion of honor has turned him into a robot of the state. In an eye blink he betrays his daughter in order to obey his emperor, and when his sons side with their sister, he kills one of them.

Needless to say, hyper-allegiance to a capricious tyrant turns out to be a fatal mistake. Through the machinations of the eerily fascinating Tamora (Judith-Marie Bergan), a barbarian queen, Titus is stripped of his status, and loses two more sons, while his daughter Lavinia (Julie Oda) falls victim to horrific mutilation. It's in the depth of Titus's suffering that Langan's performance captivates, revealing emotional subtleties and a desperate humor beneath the old man's deadpan sense of duty.

As You Like It is as different from Titus as the light of wit and ingenuity from the shadowy tumult of the id. Still, director Penny Metropulos' approach to Shakespeare here resembles Edmondson's in its emphasis on clean clarity. Like the deceptively simple set, whose distinctive rake and intriguing doors gradually assert their comic power, this production begins literally on a quiet note, with a dumb show banishing of Duke Senior, Rosalind's father, but by the second half, has woven a complicated, yet finely balanced web of hilarious confusion.

At the center are the vividly realized, counterposed cousins. Rosalind, played by Deidrie Henry, exudes the free-wheeling energy of an adorable tomboy, while Vilma Silva as Celia stays grounded with a Mary Poppins blend of propriety and spunk. Dan Donohue's elegant, almost prim Touchstone succumbs to the best Audrey (Alicia Mandelkow) I've ever seen—gawky but winsome, not the usual buxom bimbo—and the pantomime death threats with which he scares off his rustic rival are pure genius. It's difficult not to attach positive superlatives to every facet of this production. Just when you may have thought you had seen enough versions of this oft-performed comedy, the OSF proposes a perfectly proportioned one that is just as you like it, thoroughly Shakespeare and thoroughly new.

In his penultimate play, The Winter's Tale, Shakespeare threw plausibility to the winds, yoking tragedy to comedy, and placing a hungry bear at the point where they meet. Of the many problems this late work poses, the most crucial concerns the sudden onset in Act One of King Leontes' suspicions concerning his wife, Hermione, and his lifelong friend, Polixenes. And while the text of the play insists on Hermione's fidelity, their hitherto happy marriage, and Polixenes' loyalty, Director Michael Donald Edwards' production makes us wonder.

The Leontes (John Pribyl) of the opening act seems neither regal or appealing, but rather a petulant golden boy, used to getting his way. It's Christmas in the 1950s, and the holiday scene conjures the chilly stiffness of an official photo op. A giant, artificial white tree dominates its midst like a comment on Leontes' ego. The more repressed and repressive this patriarch appears, the more credible becomes the eruption of his jealousy, but the more puzzling is Hermione's (Catherine Lynn Davis) supposed devotion to him. When she removes a long evening glove to allow Polixenes to examine her palm, then places his hand on her pregnant belly, is she exposing her subconscious rebellion? These intimacies may make Leontes' paranoia a little more explicable, but they confuse as much as they clarify. So does the scene shift to Bohemia and its tie-dyed take on the sixties. While the bussed-in tenth-graders in the audience may cheer Autolycus-as-rock star in a psychedelic VW, the central thread of Leontes' repentance and transformation gets lost.

Coincidentally, Route 66, the summer offering at the Oregon Cabaret, also highlights the shift in spirit between the fifties and the sixties, though in this case, the difference is expressed through road songs before the Beach Boys as opposed to during their heyday! Beneath a huge radio dial that flips itself, an irresistible, talented quartet—Brandon Collinsworth, Scot Davis, Andrew Zane Fullerton, and Michael Jenkinson—sings and dances and jokes its way through the two decades, thirteen cities, and twice as many wild costume changes. I could run for a week on the energy just one of these dynamos must burn in every show. By the final number, they have more than earned our grateful applause—Collinsworth for his comic pathos, Davis for his handsome versatility, Fullerton for his Tommy Smothers goofiness, and Jenkinson, who also created the choreography, for his precise professionalism. Expect spoon playing, finger snapping sing-alongs, cross dressing, and a chorus line of highway patrolmen, as well as a juicy dose of nostalgia. JM

Three Pages from American History

They came to a fine little river. Fragrant strawberries hung in heavy clusters. Flocks of turkey, deer prancing, companies of young Cherokee gathering the ripe berries, others reclining under magnolia. A group advanced with modest maiden blush, presented their baskets, merrily telling us their fruit was ripe and sound. And now taking leave, traversing obliquely their flowery beds, arrived in town in the cool of the evening.

An image of paint and light, the fur traders descend the Missouri as if alive. They study us so closely in passing, these two with their cargo of death, and the black bear cub in the prow of the canoe. They go down the river, steady between their reflections and the luminous sky. A moment later they would have been gone.

Iron from the Welsh hills drawn into lines through prairie grass penetrates straight to the golden West, a knife in living skin opening a wound not to be closed forever. Grazing buffalo lift their heads, keeping their distance in front of the work gangs. Riders watch from the red bluffs as the wild horse shatters the night in a shower of sparks and hissing steam. The iron enters their soul. Opening of territory, a surgical operation for the better health of the body politic. The world it cuts, nothing will stitch together.
